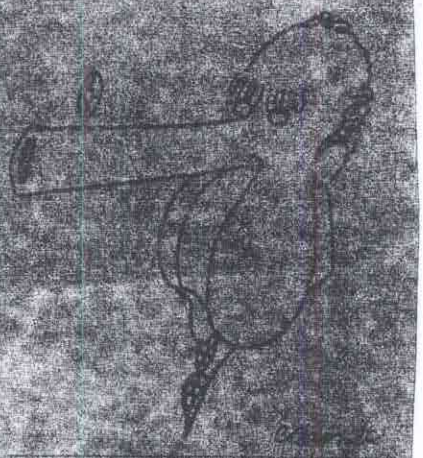
AUG 2 3 1973

By William Safire

ESSAY



Today, in his outdoor press conference, after a shaky start in which he seemed out of breath, he gained confidence answering a question about what he would have done if he had known a year ago about Watergate. "I would have blown my stack," he told Ziegler the other day. It was his most effective answer of the day.

The President is obviously under stress. The relentless television eye caught every nervous twitch in his cheek. But with the "Watergate press conference" behind him, some of that stress comes off.

The President does have a temper. He is not a plastic man; he is not a computer; he is emotional.

Rarely does he permit that temper to show. There was his "last press conference" a decade ago, at which he went through the roof, vowing later to never let his anger show in public again.

There was the time he referred to campus radicals who were throwing firebombs as "bums"; that was escalated by his critics into a Presidential characterization of all students, or all dissenters, as bums. Another time, when Clement Haynsworth's nomination was in trouble, Nixon issued an intemperate blast at the Senate.

And now, having fired Ron Ziegler [illegible] concerning the hum[illegible] sometimes a President is [illegible] his back to the public, Mr. [illegible] has been few and [illegible]

Of course, he has shown [illegible] as every [illegible] and shown [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Justice [illegible] especially [illegible] but [illegible] days [illegible] Presidents have men close to them who are under unspoken orders to not always follow spoken orders. When, in a moment of pique or vengefulness, a President barks an order or overemphasizes a direction, these men roll with the punch, delay, bring it back [illegible] for reconsideration, or conveniently forget it.

That was one of the functions of Bob Haldeman and John Ehrlichman, whose walls were perceived as a barrier against those who wanted to get to the President but was also a barrier against information not considered authorized. Al Haig and Ron Ziegler are stepping into that role today.

Not all the Presidents' men are so hardened or so convinced of the need for delay and discretion in view. Mr. Nixon has told us in his session with Egil Krogh, then 32 years old, a "straight arrow" who could be highly motivated to carry out what he considered a super-patriotic mission. Krogh did not drag his feet. He found out and hired the plumbers to do the job.

At other times the President protected himself [illegible] around him [illegible] nally, others [illegible] upon to take [illegible] of salt. Because [illegible] was this safety [illegible] of his orders [illegible] self privately [illegible]

[illegible] been the man who [illegible]

A couple of years ago, the President received [illegible] State Department [illegible] And [illegible] was the elected representative of the people and [illegible] the President [illegible]

[illegible] to Secretary of State William [illegible] that [illegible] effect. "Everybody [illegible]

Bill Rogers [illegible] education problem or replacement, that sort of thing."

The President gave the Secretary of State a funny look. "What was it I wanted?"

"To fire everybody in Laos, remember?"

The President laughed, shaking his head, "Hell, Bill—you know me better than that."